

JOHN RODGERS
Director, Office of Aviation Policy and Plans
Federal Aviation Administration

John Rodgers, director of Aviation Policy and Plans, has served with the Federal Aviation Administration for 24 years. He has been involved in policy development regarding federal airport and airway system finances, airport environment, capacity and access, and FAA safety regulation. He is currently involved in forecasting and establishing policy related to provision of future airport and airway services and regulation of the aviation industry.

Prior to joining the FAA, Mr. Rodgers served as a vice president with Jack Faucett Associates, an economic consulting firm, and in marketing research at Black and Decker Manufacturing Company. A graduate of the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce and the University of Pennsylvania, he has also pursued graduate studies in economics at Vanderbilt University. He is a Certified Public Accountant, a member of the American Economic Association, the Maryland Association of CPA's, and a former member of the Transportation Research Board. Mr. Rodgers has written several books related to regional economic models